section of the Palais Royal this week is like a breath of springtime, for the annual spring opening with its wealth of color is being held throughout the week, and is being visited by throngs of women, who are enthusiastic over the new models displayed in both departments. Many of the new hats have been imported especially for this opening, and their duplicates are not to be found in this city. The salons of the most noted Paris milliners have been called upon to contribute to this annual festival, and the modes shown are far in advance of the season's styles, while conforming to that conservatism that is the hallmark of the servatism that is the hallmark of the hallmark of the hall seem of the season's gentlewoman. partments. Many of the new hats have | knot. American gentlewoman.

One of the prettiest models shown in the millinery French room of the Palais Royal is formed of black hemp straw, in the popular Tam o' Shanter It is trimmed about its upturned brim with an edging of white ostrich feathers, which meets at the right of the front beneath two tightly curled tips. This is a Beboux model, and is delightfully chic.

Another "dream" from the French capital is a large hat, which has been appropriately named "The Aeroplane." It is made of white hemp, and the brim is covered with primrose colored chiffon crepe, caught down on the left side by a row of little velvet bows that seem to have slid down from the crown by a row of little velvet bows that seem to have slid down from the crown and are undecided whether they will stay where they are or fall to the wearer's shoulder. The edge of the hat is finished with a quilling of primrose velvet, and at the right there is a cockade effect of sweet peas and pansles, shading from a blush pink to deepest purple. It is a daring color combination, but artistically carried out, as only the French understand how to combine two elementary colors

Quite different from its associates is a hat of pepper and salt hend in a green and black mixture. This shows a low crewn of green glace taffeta. The distinctive feature of this charming chapeau is that the trimming comes from beneath the brim: a fancy green and black ostrich feather being tacked on beneath a little chou of green, gold, and pink glace silk roses.

Another charming hat, which was made in the Palais Royal workrooms, is a little white poke, smothered in black annalize. It has a lattice crown of lilles of the valley and pink rosebinds. The crown is finished at the top with a band of primrose velvet, ending in a far knot at the left of the front.
